1　会話文読解（配点 50点）

以下の会話文を読んで，後の設問に答えよ。（＊印の語句は会話文の後で説明している。）職場の同僚 Gwen と Ottilie が月曜日の朝に話している。

Gwen: Morning! You look rested. Did you do anything nice at the weekend?

Ottilie: I spent most of Saturday at the allotment*. My neighbour Freya and I started renting a plot together this spring. What about you?

Gwen: Well, we tried something new. We had what my daughter called a “screen-free weekend.” No phones, no tablets, no television, from Friday night until Sunday evening.

Ottilie: Really? How did that go? I can't imagine my house without the television on in the background.

Gwen: It started badly, I'll be honest. (1)On Saturday morning my husband reached for his phone about ten times before breakfast, and each time he had to put it back in the drawer. The children kept asking what they were supposed to do, and by eleven o'clock everyone was in a bad mood.

Ottilie: That sounds like my idea of a nightmare.

Gwen: But then it changed. After lunch my son found an old board game in the cupboard, one we'd bought years ago and never opened. We played it for nearly three hours. Nobody wanted to stop, not even my husband, who usually says board games are for children.

Ottilie: Three hours! I'm impressed. Did you manage to keep going on Sunday as well?

Gwen: Mostly. We walked up to the reservoir* and had a picnic, and in the evening we cooked together. The only problem was that I'd promised my sister I'd ring her on Sunday afternoon to talk about our mum's birthday. (2)I'd completely forgotten that my phone was locked in the drawer, so she ended up calling our landline* five times and leaving a rather worried message.

Ottilie: Oh no. Was she cross?

Gwen: A little, at first. She thought something had happened to us. But when I explained, she laughed and said she might try it herself. Anyway, how's the allotment going? Are you growing much yet?

Ottilie: Beans, lettuces and a few potatoes. Freya does most of the watering, because she passes the gate every morning on her way to the station. I usually go on Saturdays, and my son comes along when he can be persuaded.

Gwen: It sounds lovely. Was it hard to get started?

Ottilie: Much harder than I expected. (3)I came close to giving up after the first month, if I'm honest. Slugs* ate every single lettuce we planted, it rained for two weeks so we couldn't dig, and neither of us had any idea when to sow* anything. Then an older man on the next plot, Mr Pennock, took pity on us. He showed us how to protect the young plants and gave us a calendar he'd made himself.

Gwen: How kind of him. So now you're hooked*?

Ottilie: Completely. And (4)I really like the way the whole place is run. There's a shared shed full of tools, so nobody has to buy their own spade. There's a table by the gate where people leave spare seeds for anyone to take, and a box where you can put vegetables you can't eat yourself, so nothing goes to waste. Nobody competes over who has the biggest pumpkin, and every member takes a turn weeding the paths between the plots.

Gwen: That sounds more like a village than a garden.

Ottilie: That's exactly how it feels. You should come and see it one Saturday. I'm sure Mr Pennock would happily give you a tour, as long as you don't mind listening to his opinions about slugs.

2　長文読解（配点 50点）

以下の英文を読んで，後の設問に日本語で答えよ。（＊印の語句は英文の後で説明している。）

① Many people blame a lack of willpower when getting up in the morning feels like a battle or when sleep refuses to come at night. Researchers who study the body's internal clock, however, suggest that the cause may often lie elsewhere. (1)What they have increasingly come to believe is that the less natural light people receive early in the day, the later their bodies prepare for sleep, and the harder it becomes for them to wake up refreshed. Because modern life keeps so many of us indoors during the morning hours, this finding may help to explain why tiredness has become such a common complaint.

⑥ None of this means that light is the only factor that matters. Stress, noise, diet and medical conditions can all affect how well people sleep, and anyone who has long-term difficulties should seek advice from a doctor. Yet the idea that something as simple and free as morning daylight could make a difference is encouraging. It reminds us that our bodies evolved under an open sky, and that many of the habits of modern indoor life, however convenient, may be working quietly against our natural rhythms.

設問 1

Read the two conversations below between you and Matteo, a student from abroad. Then finish the final remark in each one in English, giving details.

Conversation A

Matteo: My parents are coming to visit next month, and they want to see a bit of the area. I have no idea where to take them.

You: How long are they staying?

Matteo: Only three days, and my mother can't walk very far because of her knee. My father, though, gets bored if there's nothing to do.

You: Well, there are a few options. There's the castle park in the city centre. It's flat and has lots of benches, and in spring the cherry trees are amazing. Or there's the hot spring town up in the mountains. It takes about an hour by bus, but you can relax in the baths and there's a small museum about the local pottery. There's also the morning market by the harbour, where you can try fresh seafood and talk to the fishermen.

Matteo: They all sound great. If you had to pick just one, which would you choose for them?

You: I think the ［. . .］ would be best, because ［. . .］.

Conversation B

Matteo: I joined the photography club last week, and today we learned about something called the “rule of thirds.”

You: The rule of thirds? What's that?

Matteo: You imagine two lines across the picture and two lines down it, so the picture is divided into nine equal parts. Instead of putting your subject right in the middle, you put it on one of the lines, or where two lines cross. It usually makes the photo look more balanced and interesting.

You: So it's not always best to put the most important thing in the centre?

Matteo: Exactly. And the empty space matters too. If you take a picture of someone running, you should leave more space in front of them than behind them, so it looks like they have somewhere to go.

You: Got it. Then to shoot the sunset over the sea, I should ［. . .］.
